We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In early 1957, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In 1957, the guilds launched their efforts. They held countless fundraisers, worked tirelessly to make it a success, and even the local "royalty," a variety of food and drink booths, games and even a grand parade. These events were popular and helped to raise awareness and support for the hospital building fund.

In 1960, in order to qualify for Hill-Burton government funding, it was required that a unified Whidbey Hospital District be established. Voters approved a unified Whidbey Hospital District in 1961, and the Parent Guild was renamed the Whidbey Island Hospital District in 1962.

As part of the hospital, commissioners were elected: Ed Adamson, Ted Christensen and James Hay. Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In 1964, Whidbey Island voters approved a $650,000 hospital bond. The goal to build a hospital in five years stretched to 13. Delays were caused by intense bickering among islanders with long-held rivalries, as well as by difficulties in raising the necessary funds.

In 1965, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In early 1957, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In early 1957, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In 1957, the guilds launched their efforts. They held countless fundraisers, worked tirelessly to make it a success, and even the local "royalty," a variety of food and drink booths, games and even a grand parade. These events were popular and helped to raise awareness and support for the hospital building fund.

In 1960, in order to qualify for Hill-Burton government funding, it was required that a unified Whidbey Hospital District be established. Voters approved a unified Whidbey Hospital District in 1961, and the Parent Guild was renamed the Whidbey Island Hospital District in 1962.

As part of the hospital, commissioners were elected: Ed Adamson, Ted Christensen and James Hay. Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In 1964, Whidbey Island voters approved a $650,000 hospital bond. The goal to build a hospital in five years stretched to 13. Delays were caused by intense bickering among islanders with long-held rivalries, as well as by difficulties in raising the necessary funds.

In 1965, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In early 1957, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In 1957, the guilds launched their efforts. They held countless fundraisers, worked tirelessly to make it a success, and even the local "royalty," a variety of food and drink booths, games and even a grand parade. These events were popular and helped to raise awareness and support for the hospital building fund.

In 1960, in order to qualify for Hill-Burton government funding, it was required that a unified Whidbey Hospital District be established. Voters approved a unified Whidbey Hospital District in 1961, and the Parent Guild was renamed the Whidbey Island Hospital District in 1962.

As part of the hospital, commissioners were elected: Ed Adamson, Ted Christensen and James Hay. Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.

In 1964, Whidbey Island voters approved a $650,000 hospital bond. The goal to build a hospital in five years stretched to 13. Delays were caused by intense bickering among islanders with long-held rivalries, as well as by difficulties in raising the necessary funds.

In 1965, a group of women who shared a common need – reliable healthcare for their families – gathered together. They wanted a hospital. Tenacity and Determination

We need a hospital now! Perhaps it was the 100 years of arduous off-island journeys to treat sickness or injury that fueled the desire for a hospital. It was full-speed ahead to build a hospital in Coupeville.